

You will be moogled

After decades of observation, the probe Human Rights IV was sent to the planet Ross 508 b with an important mission. If earthlings had become pacific, respectful, wise and forgiving with their pairs and any other living being, why not try to achieve the same degree of kindness with all the inhabitants of that planet? They would be eager to improve themselves, that's a given.

The intelligent humanoids of the planet Crastdwel lived their happy existence unaware of being scrutinized by any other civilization. They used to stroll by the beach, singing eight-voiced improvisations, laughing with the inevitable mistakes they eventually made. Unless they had to stop singing to refill their energy vacuoles, they would endlessly enjoy their choir plays.

When the astronauts from the Earth ended the entering, descending and landing manoeuvres, they gathered a big bunch of curious locals and started to explain the reason for the unannounced visit. It all came down to the fact that there was a book titled The Human Rights Act and earthlings expected it to be adopted by crastdwelians without running up against any resistance.

But locals rejected to embrace the new philosophy because they already live without any evil. Crastdwelians explained to the astonished visitors that as soon as they are born, their left grestgand is replaced by a carbon-based device which allows them instant communication with a central source of wisdom, so they never have to judge if their actions are good or evil, as the dilemma is externally solved.

A few of the remaining locals still in the mood to chat with the astronauts explained that they call "be moogled" to the mental state they get after receiving the call from the central source of wisdom.

The visitors went to the facilities of that powerful intelligence and were taught by the spokesperson that a few high-efficiency algorithms had evolved through the centuries on their own to achieve the consciousness to be certain of 100 per cent of the decisions made.

Their name is...

Moogole

Download link

Licence: CC BY